INTRODUCTION

Frontiers in Vascular Medicine (FVM)

Cardiovascular diseases, such as coronary artery disease, angina pectoris, myocardial infarction and stroke, still represent a major medical need: they are the number one cause of death world-wide with an increasing socio-economic burden. Our current lack of understanding of the underlying molecular mechanisms is reflected in our therapeutic approaches, which primarily treat symptoms of these diseases rather than their causes. Moreover, patients at risk are identified with poor precision and the individual treatment efficacy cannot be monitored at present. Consequently, unacceptably high numbers of patients are treated to prevent even one cardiovascular death. Therefore, researchers worldwide are aiming at identifying the molecular mechanisms and therapeutic targets of vascular diseases in order to identify individuals at risk—ideally before cardiovascular symptoms become apparent—and subsequently to treat those patients to prevent disease outbreak or progression with unprecedented precision. Recent breakthroughs in identifying novel mechanisms such as endogenous nitric oxide, the Nox/Duox gene family as sources of vascular oxidative stress and a much deeper understanding of the renin-angiotensin system are exciting new developments toward that long-term objective and represent therapeutically exploitable targets.

Following on from the resounding success of the previous Frontiers in Vascular Medicine conference 2005 (FVM), FVM 2007 brings together internationally renowned experts on the field of Vascular Medicine together with young emerging scientists to exchange and discuss state-of-the-art findings on the Frontiers in Vascular Medicine. Apart from this scientific exchange at the highest level, the meeting intends to foster future collaborations in international research structures.

The 3-day program will cover a cross-section of hot topical areas, including Cardiovascular imaging, Clinical biomarkers and Diagnostics for cardiovascular diseases, ROS and endothelial dysfunction, Cerebral and microvascular circulation.

This is an opportunity to demonstrate to the clinical community and wider general community.
